Explanation:

Case Study 1, Cisco .com

Cisco .com is an insurance company that has 350 agent offices around Europe.

Each office has a Frame Relay link to the corporate headquarters in Nice. Because of Cisco corporate policy, the bandwidth of the agent links is determined by and paid for by the agents working in their offices. The agents use the network connection primarily to access various database systems at Nice headquarters and also for e-mail and Internet access.

Cisco .com has budgeted 5 million Euro to upgrade the primarily Token-Ring and FDDI network infrastructure at headquarters to fully redundant Gigabit and FastEthernet LAN. The upgrade will reduce long-term network costs and improve the performance, reliability, compatibility, scalability, and manageability of the LAN infrastructure. Cisco .com is starting a recruiting effort that it hopes will result in the addition of 200 new agent offices in the next three years. Cisco .com needs higher capacity to meet the potential demand of the new agents. The project must be completed in three months because of the anticipated demands of a new E-commerce system, which will increase revenue, and a new customer service system, which will improve customer satisfaction.

Although the equipment is from a non-Cisco vendor, the current network is an all Cisco solution

WAN infrastructure.

Cisco wants the LAN to be a complete Cisco solution as well. IT staff is outsourced by the company with the result that the Cisco WAN is managed remotely. The onsite IT staff have limited Cisco networking knowledge. Company policy dictates that all company data be physically stored in company facilities resulting in the company's website, although outsourced, is maintained by personnel and servers located at the head quarters and connected directly to the LAN.

The web developers make use of Macintosh workstations and a mixture of Macintosh and Sun Solaris servers. The insurance database systems use an IBM mainframe or Oracle on HPUX servers with custom-developed client software. The e-mail system is based on Eudora.
